As the Royal Commission invited public submissions on whether there should be a legislated structural change to fix superannuation problems: So far, the Royal Commission has exposed an alarming volume of intentional behavior and method of corruption among banks in relation to various financial tools and services, I am deeply concern about my life saving and therefore would urge you to stop and prevent the banks from looting our super by putting in place an adequate structural separation. In my opinion, Australia needs a Glass-Steagall type of structural separation of the banking system. We had enough of looting, corruption and people will revolt soon if nothing is been done. Regards
